

SPARKS' PERSPECTIVE

Ron Sparks
Commissioner

Avian influenza has been getting more and more attention in the news lately and with good reason. Reports that avian influenza, or AI, has caused illness and death in Asian countries are frightening to us here in the United States. I want to tell you more about AI and what we at the Alabama Department of Agriculture and Industries are doing to help protect you from the spread of this disease.

First, it is important to understand that AI is an animal health issue with potential human concerns. The current spread of the viral disease in Asia in poultry and to humans has predominantly been through their local poultry houses. Based on the current information we have, there have not been any recent confirmed cases of AI in humans in this country.

With all of the research we have at this time, the likelihood of a person in the United States being infected with AI is very low. According to the USDA Animal Plant Health Inspection Service, AI is spread through direct contact with secretions and excrement of infected poultry. Proper cooking and handling of poultry greatly reduces the chance of AI and other food borne illnesses being present. People who have contracted the virus in Asia were reported to be in direct contact with the birds infected with AI. In some countries, it is common for workers to live in or near their poultry houses.

I believe that there is no comparison between poultry house practices in Alabama and those in the Asian countries that have been affected by this disease. Bio-security has been an important issue to the agricultural industry for a long time. In the U.S., the poultry industry takes strict measures to protect their workers, the public, and the food supply. Not only do they do the simple things that make a big difference such as entry site foot baths, farmers and producers in Alabama are now using GPS systems and premises ID registration to track and protect their flocks.

The overall health of birds in the U.S. is better than in most other countries because of the stringent precautions taken here. Birds are raised in an indoor environment, protected from inclement weather and airborne disease, wild migratory birds, and receive good nutrition. Poultry is also tested for diseases including AI. The AI test is similar to a human strep test. A swab is used to take a sample from inside the bird's mouth. As anyone who has had a strep test knows, this procedure is uncomfortable, but not painful or harmful to the birds.

To protect our food supply and the poultry industry, the

Auburn's Agricultural Initiative

With agriculture being the number one industry in Alabama, Dr. Ed Richardson is looking to position Auburn University for the future through an innovative new initiative for the agricultural college. Dr. Richardson took a few minutes to give the Farmers and Consumers Bulletin an overview.

What inspired the new agricultural initiative at Auburn?

There were several reasons. I think what we have seen is that many industries within this country, whether it be textile or manufacturing, steel and so forth, have suffered greatly because of competition from other countries who could produce it more cheaply. What I am seeing increasingly is that whether it is seafood, crops, or livestock other countries are able to produce food products more cheaply. This told me that unless something is done to reposition agriculture for the future that it would be heading just like textiles and others in this country and that is to a reduction in jobs, major cutbacks and things like that. What we have to decide for Auburn now is what direction will we take? I then pulled together a commission of about 25 representatives of the commodity groups ranging from poultry to cattle, and timber and pulled all of those together. We went through a process with a consultant as to what these people see, what we need to do, what are the problems. They all saw very quickly that agriculture had some very serious problems and they were looking to Auburn University to position for the future. We had to decide which direction to go. We have now had a study group here within the university that has made a concerted effort to try and identify the future. I think what we can say safely is that there are some commodities that will not be appropriate for Auburn in the future if we are to reallocate our resources and position ourselves for the future. But I don't think there is any question that issues like natural resources, water utilization, environmental issues, ecotourism, issues like this are very positive, have a great future, [and] will be great social problems in the future unless we deal with them. When you look at Alabama which has such a diverse geography it is just made to order for that type [of program]. You will see us more in research; we will be looking very heavily at biodiesel alternative fuels, hydrogen fuel cells. As a matter of fact, on November 17th, we will cut the ribbon on our new research park, which will blend very nicely with this new ag initiative.

How do you see the relationship between Auburn and the Department of Agriculture and Industries in the future?

As we go forward, I hope that Auburn would be in a position to complement what the [Department] would want in terms of providing stability of income, a chance to have sustainable life in our rural environment, to be able to find those niche markets where people could make money and live. I think you are going to see [that] what we are trying to do, making it more possible for people to remain in agriculture in some capacity, is very compatible with what Commissioner Sparks would want.

New School Year Offers Healthier Choices & Changes for Students

By Rebecca Leigh White

With reports of high obesity and diabetes levels in Alabamians, educators and health advocates chose to address these serious health risks. Making positive changes in students' health, nutrition, and fitness habits will help the state's students become healthier adults. Limiting the intake of non-nutritive foods, promoting more physical fitness, and providing comprehensive instruction on healthy choices helps students feel better, which increases learning abilities.

The Alabama Board of Education voted to form a committee to review the state of health of Alabama's young people on July 13, 2004. Dr. Joe Morton, State Superintendent of Education, asked Commissioner Ron Sparks to serve as Chairman of the Nutrition Subcommittee of the statewide committee tasked to review the state of health of Alabama's youth. The recommendations, made by the Statewide Committee to Review the State of Health of America's Youth with Particular Emphasis on Alabama's Youth and approved by the Alabama Board of Education in July of 2005, call for schools to develop plans to phase out low-nutritive foods in vending machines and school stores and phase in high-nutritive food replacements, eliminate unhealthy foods in cafeterias, and add more physical education activities and requirements. Once those school plans are reviewed, approved, or have additional recommendations added by the State Superintendent of Education, the state Board will then reconsider the situation to enable full implementation to begin in the 2006-07 school year. "

Some Alabama public schools already have comprehensive health and fitness plans in place, while others will undergo quite a few changes to implement the plan. One difference will be the inclusion of more locally grown fruits and vegetables and the elimination of fried foods in school meals. Another change will limit the amount of soft drinks in vending machines for different grade levels. Additionally, new physical education guidelines require all students in Grades K-8 to participate in quality physical education classes daily.

Product Spotlight

This month we are recognizing Moore's Marinades. Moore's Original Marinade was introduced thirty years ago at a steakhouse in Jasper. In 1991 C&M Food Distributing Inc., of Birmingham, purchased Moore's Marinade and introduced the product to the grocery industry. This unique liquid marinade, with a delightfully flavorful taste, quickly became well known throughout Alabama and the South.

Due to popular demand for the Original Hickory flavor they decided a complement was needed; thus Moore's Teriyaki Marinade was created. In 2004, Moore's added a sauce to their portfolio with Moore's Buffalo Wing Sauce. All Moore's Marinades recipes are family made with the highest quality ingredients around that enhance food flavors instead of covering them. All flavors are MSG free, gluten free and Kosher. Moore's Marinade has won television, radio, billboard and cook-off awards for being one of the most versatile marinades available.

Today, Moore's Marinades are found throughout Alabama and across the U.S. in grocery stores, restaurants and shopping clubs. Moore's Marinades make any meal extraordinary. Any of Moore's products can be easily used on your favorite meat or vegetables. Are you looking for a recipe? Visit our website at www.agi.alabama.gov with a link to Moore's recipe section.

Rabies Vaccine Bait Drop

Commissioner of Agriculture and Industries Ron Sparks and State Public Health Veterinarian Dr. Mel Stephens announced the 2005 annual rabies vaccine bait drop. Distribution of oral rabies vaccine baits begins October 21 in two different bait drop zones in portions of 11 Alabama counties. Baits will be dropped from a low-flying aircraft in forested and rural regions and distributed by hand in populated areas. The distribution will begin in northeast Alabama in Cherokee, DeKalb, Etowah, Jackson and Marshall counties, followed by a bait drops in Bibb, Chilton, Jefferson, Perry, Shelby and Tuscaloosa counties. This federally funded project is intended to halt the westward movement of rabies by orally vaccinating raccoons.

Vaccine drops have been used successfully in Alabama since November 2003. Since 1989 more than 40 million baits have been distributed in the U.S. and Canada without any major problems.

State Public Health Veterinarian Dr. Mel Stephens, Agriculture & Industries Commissioner Ron Sparks, and State Director, USDA-Wildlife Services Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service Frank Boyd discuss the importance of the rabies vaccine bait drop.

Control and Prevention are cooperators in this project. USDA currently works with 15 states to distribute baits. "The vaccination of raccoons can help prevent the spread of raccoon rabies into west Alabama, where it currently is not known to occur," Commissioner Sparks stated. "Using bait drops can be very effective in our efforts to protect our families and livestock."

People and pets cannot get rabies from coming into contact with the baits, and the public is asked to leave the bait cubes undisturbed if they encounter them. However, if a bait is intact it can be moved if it is found where children and pets play. To relocate an intact bait throw it into a fence row, wooded lot, ditch or other raccoon habitat area. Damaged baits should be placed in a bag and discarded in the trash. Persons are advised to wear gloves when picking up bait and to wash their hands after any contact with damaged baits. Persons having questions about bait they have found should call the toll-free numbers found on the bait themselves or 1-800-677-0939.

Habitat Buffers for Upland Birds

By Claude Jenkins, Wildlife Biologist, Alabama Wildlife Federation

Throughout the Southeast, certain bird species associated with early successional habitats have declined to historic lows. From 1980-1999, the fall northern bobwhite population declined from nearly 59 million birds to 20 million birds. According to the U.S. Geological Survey's Breeding Bird Survey, bobwhite breeding populations declined at an average rate of 3.8% per year from 1982-1999. Although these declines have been attributed to a variety of factors such as coyotes, fire ants, and hawks, the primary cause has been the effects of landscape level habitat loss and degradation. Declining population trends are not unique to bobwhites, however. The loss of early successional habitats has resulted in precipitous declines in unexploited bird species such as loggerhead shrikes, dickcissels, eastern meadowlarks, grasshopper sparrows, and eastern king-birds.

Conservationists' concerns with regard to adverse environmental consequences associated with large-scale, highly specialized, capital-intensive farming systems have increased. Federal, state, and non-governmental conservation organizations recognized the unintended effects of intensive farming practices on soil and water quality, and wildlife habitat. This increase sensitivity to environmental stewardship is reflected in the evolution of farm policy in recent years. The most recent example is Conservation Practice 33 (CP33), Habitat Buffers for Upland Birds, which became effective in October 1, 2004.

CP33 is a novel and unprecedented conservation practice/initiative intended to provide food and cover for bobwhites and other upland birds in cropland areas. Administered by the USDA Farm Service Agency (FSA), the practice is intended to create 250,000 acres of field border habitat along the edges of eligible cropland in 35 states. FSA estimates that the essential reproductive habitats created by the initiative will increase the density of bobwhites by 750,000 birds annually. Because total enrollment is limited, enrollment is aimed at specific geographic regions that have the greatest potential to restore habitat suitable for bobwhites. Alabama has 6,100 acres allocated for CP33.

FSA estimates the program will provide $125 million in payments to participants through the year 2007. The following types of payments will be offered: Signing Incentive Payments of up to $100 per acre; Practice Incentive Payments of up to 40% of the eligible establishment cost; Annual Rental Payments and maintenance costs. Producers will receive annual rental payments for the length of the contract. The payment is 120% of the rental rate for comparable land, plus practice maintenance; and cost-share assistance of up to 50% of the eligible reimbursable practice costs.

CP33 indeed provides landowners and producers tremendous incentive and flexibility to develop a conservation farming system that meets production goals and enhances wildlife habitat. Eligible landowners interested in CP33 can sign up at local FSA offices until December 31, 2007 or until 1,600 acres have been enrolled. For more information, visit your FSA office or see www.fsa.usda.gov.
